

TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

Alison Wheeler was employed as Chief Technology Officer of Narrateo Ltd. from June 2000 until resigning and leaving the company in September 2000.

Narrateo was, at this stage in its development, an embryonic company that was evolving out of an independent television programme maker. Its aims were to encompass all forms of new media distribution for its content.

As a consequence it was in the process of relocating to larger premises, raising finance and expanding its technological base. Alison was recruited to significantly expand the company's knowledge of technologies and in due course to create a high-level technological research department.

In the event, the company's relocation was delayed due to a major unforeseen problem on the lease of the premises to which it was moving and additionally there was a delay in obtaining venture capital funding. As a consequence Alison's role became very different to that for which she had been recruited. In the event the company decided to re-group and move into temporary serviced offices pending resolving its premises problem and concentrate its efforts on raising additional finance. As a consequence Alison felt there was no real role for her talents and experience and decided to resign.

During her short time with the company she undertook a lot of work in planning the relocation and technical facilities for the company in its new premises, as well as working on the company's new website.
